Searching for Lylah

“Be prepared.”

The Russian warhead blew the front of the Mariupol apartment building off like a high stake’s gambler breaking a toothpick in two. Fire fighters waded through the rubble. Beds, desks and pots and pans are scattered about. Fallen curtains roll in the wind, dancing out from privacy.

Lylah is buried under us somewhere, her wheelchair and broken body missing in action. Her father mumbles through the carnage and weeps.

####

Lylah’s small town in Eastern Ukraine is a pawn, a black and blue check-down for the beasts at play. Tank treads in the mud. Rocket launchers screaming in the far fields. Lylah is not the only angel, out of thousands of souls, to share this fate.

“Till death do us part.”

####

American retired generals predict that the invasion could go on for months or years. No holidays allowed. CNN spiders roam the Ukrainian roads and empty cafes for stories. The competition for ratings is fierce.

“One step forward for mankind; death for a few.”

I'm not Really Here

Up in Brooklyn, the remains of fire
On the Miracle Mile, dropping quarters
Sleeping under the over pass
I'm your ghost of a chance

Losing big in Vegas
Breaking rocks in SF
Loving your yurtfull eyes
I'm the dark dance

Lost in LA
Zoo'd in Diego
Red necked in Houston
I'm the guy with the lance

You are the sound of the sea calming, full of light
virtual eyes
rose fragrance seeks the early riser
holding hands on the beach
you are my poem
